The human brain is a fascinating complex organ. Different parts of the brain control different bodily and mental functions. The part of the brain that governs our mood is called the Limbic System. In this system, as in the rest of the brain, brain cells communicate with each other with the aid of chemical messengers, that are called neurotransmitters. Serotonin and Noradrenaline are the principal neurotransmitters that are responsible to ensure the relative stability of our mood, and they need to be circulating in adequate levels to ensure that they are able to do their jobs. When life bowls us a devastating doosra, the levels of Serotonin and Noradrenaline in our brains are reduced and, therefore, we experience a feeling of depression. However, after a few weeks, we cope with our life events and these chemical messengers bounce back to their baseline levels. For some of us though, this bounce back doesn't happen, and we then go through a clinically significant depression forcing us to see a doctor. Sometimes, even a combination of relatively minor stress factors can precipitate a depression.

The best solution to avoid depression is yoga and meditation. If caught in depression, psychotherapy by a psychiatrist would help the depressed to be placed back on the normal track of life.

Questions :

44. What is the Limbic system ?
45. When does a person experience depression ?
46. What is the main function of neurotransmitters ?
47. When does a person need medical treatment for depression ?
48. Who is a psychiatrist ?
